EDITOR'S LETTER

HBO is pleased to bring you The Exorcist, the third-largest grossing film in movie history. A mixture of fact and fiction about the last church-sanctioned exorcism in America, The Exorcist may offend you. Packed with explicit special effects, this film is certainly not recommended for children. Rated "R", which means those under 17 should not see it unless an adult is present, it will be shown on HBO only at night. However, The Exorcist, based on the best-seller by William Peter Blatty, is an exciting thriller which explores a little-known area of the occult. Controversial and acclaimed, The Exorcist has a unique place in cinema history.

Tidal Wave sinks Land of the Rising Sun

Just four years ago a science fiction disaster novel single-handedly caused a curious phenomenon to sweep Japan. Entitled The Submersion of Japan, the disaster fantasy about the drowning of the Land of the Rising Sun proved ideal escapist entertainment for the financially troubled Japanese people. Its outstanding success touched off a mass media disaster blitz that climaxed with a filmed version of the novel and a spinoff TV series, in addition to other film and TV programs obviously based on the same idea.

Because of the book's astronomical popularity, producers secured ical popularity, producers secured an unheard of $3 million for what would normally be a low budget production. The result—a wet and wild disaster movie— was Japan's highest grossing film of 1974.

Arriving at the end of America's more limited disaster film fad, Tidal Wave's enormous success in the world's second largest film market —Japan—still made waves in Hollywood movie circles. The English speaking rights were purchased and an American director and cast were secured to insert sequences to help boost American audience identification. With the popular Lorne Greene as the film's star, Tidal Wave bridges the Pacific in a unique example of American-Japanese cooperation.

Hollywood's talents for technical expertise and universal story telling are nowhere more evident or successful than in HBO's premiere shocker, The Exorcist. The most expensive thriller in history—the budget reportedly was in excess of $10 million—blends the eerie but true events surrounding America's last church-sanctioned exorcism with the best special effects possible. As the millions of viewers who made The Exorcist the third largest movie money maker can attest, the result is pure nightmare.

One of the main reasons behind The Exorcist's success was the genius of Oscar-winning make-up artist Dick Smith, known as the "master of monster metamorphosis." Smith's macabre make-up work translated the seemingly impossible technical demands of William Peter Blatty's bestseller into reality. With credits ranging from Dustin Hoffman's 121-year-old Indian scout in Little Big Man to the realistic, gory details of The Godfather, Smith was the ideal person to tackle problems that even today still seem unsolvable. On Air's Hollywood correspondent recently interviewed Smith about some of the amazing work he had to do for the film.

Smith tentatively accepted the Exorcist assignment before he had read the novel, after being casually told that it would be "no big deal, just a few problems." This turned out to be an epic understatement. Smith told On Air that his main stumbling blocks revolved around Linda Blair's natural "apple cheeks, butterball nose and cherry lips," her innocent expressions and, more importantly, the fact that "the book gives you virtually nothing" in the way of a description for the demonic child. Five months of preparation, six different make-up approaches and 45 days into the shooting found Smith back at square one. His suggested makeup mask was rejected as too obviously monstrous. At the request of director William Friedkin for "less make up and more Linda Blair." Smith salvaged only the subtle touches. To this he added a few selfinflicted facial scars and presto: Linda Blair the demon.

Smith also cooperated on any special effects that entailed an actor's hair or flesh. For the famous 360-degree head rotation scene, Smith was responsible for casting an exact replica of Blair's body and head. The extended tongue, Blair's throat bloating up like a frog, the writing of "help me" on her stomach and the revolting green vomit (it was pea soup) were additional touches Smith helped develop.

But Smith's work on The Exorcist was not limited to Linda Blair. As make up artist, Smith oversaw the appearance of the film's other stars, as well as the bit players.

But whoever's face he's working on Smith is devilishly good at his profession. Right now he's at work on The Heretic, the sequel to The Exorcist. Indeed during his interview with On Air he was in the midst of finishing a life mask of Linda Blair. The sequel, which also stars Richard Burton, Max Von Sydow and Louise Fletcher, "promises to meet the expectations of the original," Smith said.

Premieres B Must Die

Darren McGavin is one of the few actors who ever interrupted a successful acting career to go to acting school in order to learn to be a successful actor. Appearing as a wouldbe assassin in a revolution-torn banana republic this month on HBO in B Must Die, McGavin came to acting after a stint as a scenic designer at Columbia Pictures proved unrewarding. A bit part in A Song to Remember led to his first acting career, which McGavin stopped-to his agent's chagrin-when he concluded he wasn't learning acting technique from his roles.

After he graduated from Lee Strasberg's Actors' Studio, McGavin worked on Broadway and in live television. During two seasons on network TV McGavin managed to star in two prime time series (Riverboat and Mike Hammer). McGavin recently starred as a down-and-out newspaper reporter in The Night Stalker, the most popular movie ever made for TV November 26.29

Sports

Action in November

There's sports of all sorts on tap this month on HBO. From pro basketball to figure skating, November has something for almost all sports fans.

"A big ham like me, I love those cameras. Every game should be on TV." So says George McGinnis, the crowd-pleasing forward of the Philadelphia 76ers. McGinnis will get a chance to show his stuff when Philadelphia takes on the Golden State Warriors Nov. 4 on HBO.

With McGinnis inside and with Doug Collins and Fred Carter outside, the 76ers made it into postseason play last spring for the first time in five years.

The Warriors, winners of the 1974-75 NBA title, were knocked out of last season's playoffs by Phoenix. Look for explosive Phil Smith and Rick Barry to generate much of the offense for the Warriors

Gymnasts from around the world will be seen Nov. 29 when they meet in Toronto in the first major confrontation in the sport since the Olympics. Another gathering of worldclass competitors—figure skaters in this case-will be seen Nov. 8 and 15. Both men and women skaters will be taking part in this event from Ottawa, which is known as Skate Canada. HBO subscribers will also be able to see the opening night of the famous National Horse Show from Madison Square Garden Nov. 2.

To balance the sports menu, there will also be some slam-bang events. There will be an evening of professional wrestling Nov. 22, with a repeat showing Nov. 27. There will be plenty of National Hockey League action throughout the month as well. And of course there's the excitement of the battle for Canada's Grey Cup, described on Page 14.

Zany Steve Martin

Steve Martin was a boy who wanted to be a comedian during those not very good years for comics—the sober sixties. While he waited for times to change he won an Emmy—at the age of 20—for the punch lines he wrote for the Smothers Brothers TV show. He also wrote jokes for Sonny and Cher and he learned magic tricks that didn't work (but broke up his audiences anyhow).

In the meantime America's appetite for humor resurged. Martin's name is not yet a household word in comedy, but that condition is bound to be shortlived. Last month he hosted NBC's Saturday Night. His zany routines are in demand on college campuses. He has even left his Los Angeles homeland and moved to Colorado's Rockies where he is regenerating his sense of humor and is writing a movie for Paramount.

Home Box Office viewers will be able to see how all of that bizarre goofiness paid off when Martin appears On Location this month from Los Angeles. Presto—a new star.
